Economic growth isn't dead. The recession and the euro crisis hit hard in the United States and Europe, but the emerging markets of Brazil, Russia, India and China, that is, the BRIC nations, grew. The global trend of economic growth from 1991 to 2008 took a break for a time but then continued, as economic expansion proved the most likely path for world markets. Prosperity must keep going – it governs the health and safety of the world's seven billion people.

Pursuit of wealth can be a cooperative and mutually beneficial endeavor. Power struggles end with winners and losers; economic expansion creates winners on all sides. The money generated by international trade boosts living standards, fosters political stability and creates an incentive for adversaries to get along.

The 21st century will be an era of relative peace and democratic capitalism. A new mindset of "war-aversion" avails; it's better to trade and invest with your rivals than to make war. Weaponry advances have also raised the stakes of war. Advanced nations can easily kill many people and are less willing to do so. Yet war has not disappeared. Conflict in Congo claimed five million people in the 1990s. Because Congo matters little to the world economy, its war created no fiscal waves outside Central Africa. War would shock the economies of North America, Europe and Asia – and so has become rare. The newly emergent powers of Russia, India and China have less war-aversion than the West's developed nations. Though they are less skittish about war, they remain reluctant to engage in it. China, for instance, would see a declaration of sovereignty by Taiwan as an act of war. Yet China is so intertwined in the global economy that it can't afford a conflict that might disrupt commerce or invite sanctions from trading partners. Costs of war make invasions and fighting a poor investment, especially compared to the alternative of vibrant trade. As the United States emerged as the world's policeman, spending by American consumers – not fighting by American soldiers – has proven the most powerful driver of global prosperity over the past seven decades.

International trade is a force for good, fostering cooperation and discouraging war. Yet many governments still protect their economies from free trade. Protectionism, deeply embedded in 20th-century nationalism, remains a powerful force in global politics. Nations recognize that globalism can be economically disruptive. A country that enters world markets runs the risk that some of its citizens will lose their jobs because they can't compete with those who produce similar goods and services elsewhere. Governments respond to this threat by creating barriers to foreign competitors, like high tariffs on imports. Political pressure also can thwart cross-border investments. For instance, in 2005 a state-run firm from China tried to buy Unocal, an American oil company. In 2006, Dubai Ports World sought to take over a
