

THE RESPIRATORY SYSTEM & ASTHMA

Ventilation

Ventilation is the movement of air into and out of the respiratory system. Breathing involves in the expansion and contraction of the chest cavity, which allows air to enter and leave the lungs. The air enters the lungs through the trachea and bronchi, and is then distributed to the alveoli, where it is exchanged with the blood.

Inspiration

- Diaphragm contracts and moves down
- Rib cage expands
- Lung volume increases

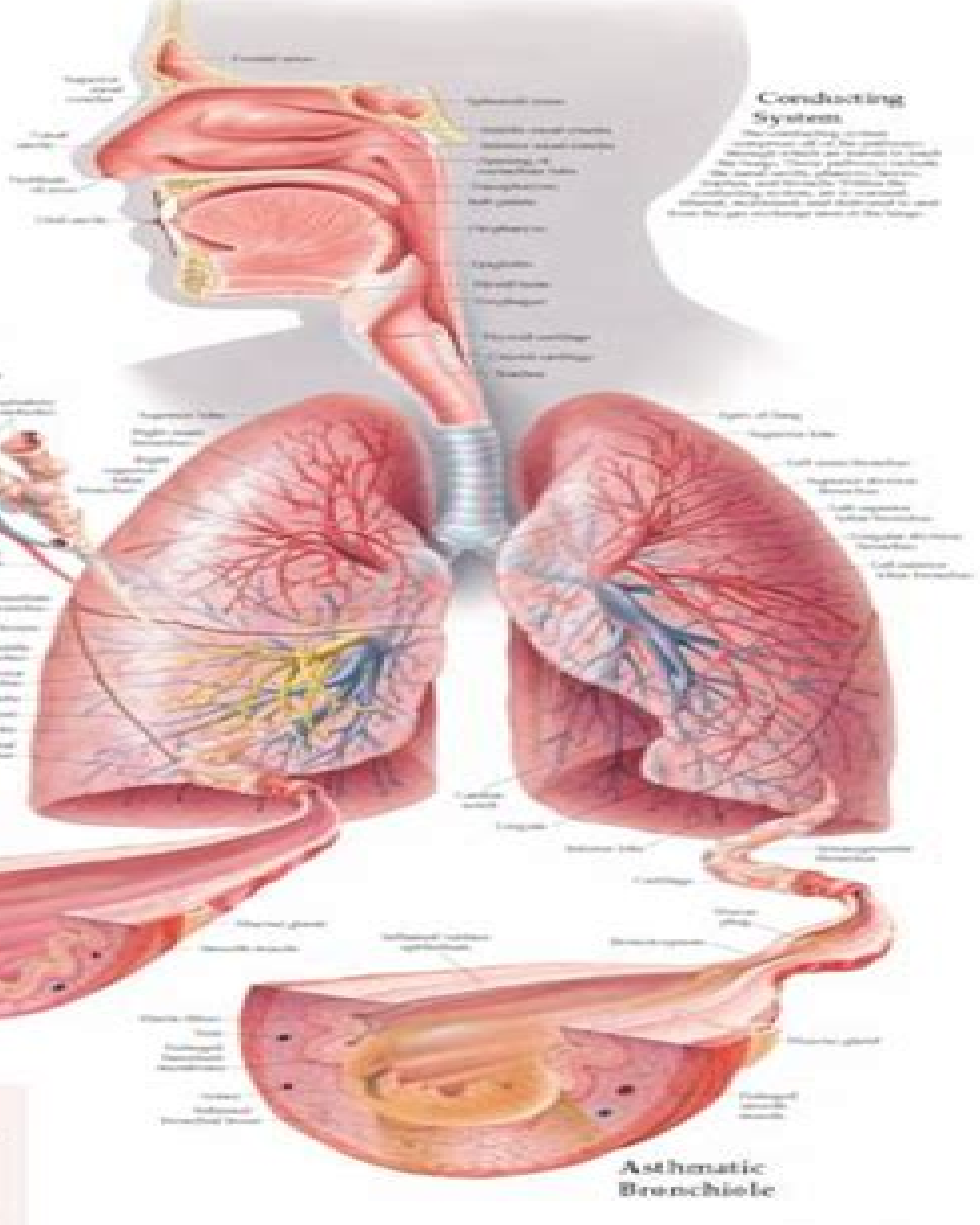

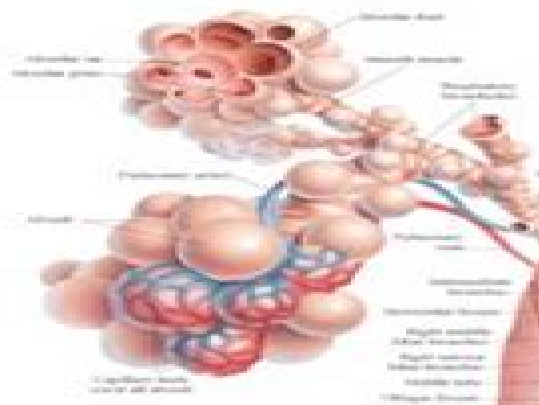

Expiration

- Diaphragm relaxes and moves up
- Rib cage contracts
- Lung volume decreases

Gas Exchange

Gas exchange is the process by which oxygen is taken up by the blood and carbon dioxide is removed. This occurs in the alveoli, where the blood is in contact with the air. The oxygen diffuses from the air into the blood, and the carbon dioxide diffuses from the blood into the air.

Conducting System

The conducting system is the part of the respiratory system that carries air in and out of the lungs. It includes the trachea, bronchi, and bronchioles. The air enters the lungs through the trachea and is then distributed to the alveoli, where it is exchanged with the blood.
