Thai farmers responding to Millet's The Gleaners, from Araya Rasdjarmrearnsook, The Two Planets
series (2008)

In her series Two Planets (2008) the artist Araya Rasdjarmrearnsook presented small groups of Thai villagers with images from the history of European modernist painting (Millet's The Gleaners, Van Gogh's The Midday Sleep, etc.) and recorded their responses. Their reactions are both speculative and pragmatic, drawing on their own experiences of labor and perceived commonalities with the subjects of the paintings. This unusual encounter complicates the circuit of identification typical in modern art, in which the bourgeois artist claims to speak from a position of empathy with a class Other (peasant, proletarian, revolutionary), evoking their lived experience in images intended to shock, shame or discomfit other members of the bourgeoisie. In some cases (Millet or Van Gogh) this class ventriloquism takes the form of an aesthetic tribute in which the poor are portrayed as exemplars of a nobility, fortitude or innocence that is singularly lacking among the bourgeoisie. And in others their exhausted or coerced bodies are presented as a calculated affront, intended to force viewers into awareness of their own class privilege, in a tradition that extends from Courbet to Santiago Sierra.
